CRS Film Screenings Fall 2013—Architecture and Body
Cinema, art and architecture have often been closely related but not often enough studied together. These film screenings aim to explore the rich formal and technical parallels among them, the shared intellectual debates in which they have been entwined, the representation of architecture, art and performance by filmmakers, and the ways in which motion pictures have influenced architects, installation artists and set designers in their practice and design. Organized in a way that is partly thematic and partly historical, the films selected will touch on art, architecture and cinematic explorations from a variety of directions. The architect as a kind of set designer for whom buildings must be spectacular, entertaining, and performative, a sense is especially evident in the classical era and, more recently, in postmodernism where architecture has been heavily informed by mass media.
